The idea that laws do not come from Divinity but common sense and that the miracles in religious texts were accomplished due to mind control. It wasn't brought up excessively but that's a VERY strong anti-religious sentiment. In any case, I wasn't really around online much when AC1 came out but if there wasn't a bunch of religious argument then, there won't be now.

I didn't find anything particularly anti-religious about the first game other than the beliefs of a couple of the characters (and I'm a Christian), nor have I seen a shred of controversy over it. If they continue that trend in this game then I'm sure everything will be just fine.

By three methods we may learn wisdom:
Through reflection, which is noblest; through imitation, which is easiest; and through experience, which is bitterest.

I have faith in God. I have anti-faith in man.

*God made man, so are you calling God a -up?

Supposedly, he made man imperfect, so they could choose whether to love him or not. Therefore he didn't screw up, it was deliberate.

Can we have fun now ?

the religious stuff boiled down to, yes there is a god, he made the golden apples, but stuff like the parting of the red sea and pretty much everything Jesus did was using the apples... which sounds more believable than the stories in the bible for me... but my opinion is kinda skewed with me not really being religious, actually I'm not a big fan, think about how many people died because of it, just in the crusades alone, which is a tiny fraction mehh you know what, I'll do something not done a lot on the internet, I'll correct myself, religion isn't really to blame, it's the stupid people who take it too far, if there was a god I don't think he would want people dying over him, unless he's a *, but what really pisses me off are the hard core religious people, who pretty much react to everything with a "you're wrong" and don't listen. I hope they burn in hell

Well, I was only trying to see if that attitude was a two-way street. I was responding to those of you who imagine a Christian objecting to the content of AC2, and then imagine responding with "if you don't like it then don't *ing play it". Just seeing how much of a difference context makes.

And by the way, I'm atheist. Just in case anyone's looking to discredit my point just because they think I have a stake in this from a religious standpoint.

God gave us free-will, we are too idiotic to use it right which is why this life is a test
